THE UNIVERSITY OF ALBERTA STAFF BULLETIN

EDMONTON 7, ALBERTA

SEPTEMBER 23, 1971

Too many teachers?

During the past month and a half, local and national publications have painted dreary pictures of the surplus of teachers on the job market. As the supply increases and the demand stabilizes or even decreases, the effects are felt not only among the jobless teachers, but at the universities that grant the education degrees as well.

E. D. HODGSON, Professor of Educational Administration and recently Acting Associate Dean of Graduate Studies at the University, says the teacher surplus may be one reason graduate enrolment is not increasing.

"Teachers are hanging on to the jobs they have because if they go on leave to do graduate work, their jobs might not be there when they get back. There may be a slot on the teaching staff, but there is no guarantee they will get to teach the same courses they were teaching before."

Dr. Hodgson attributes the job shortage to a number of factors. The student population, like the national birth rate, has stabilized. He also says there is the "ever-present" tendency of people who have taken teacher training to stay in metropolitan areas" rather than to seek employment in areas of lower population density.

"A third factor is the migration to this province of literally hundreds of teachers from Saskatchewan," says Dr. Hodgson. "First they come across the border and teach in what might be called 'undesirable' areas. Then, after getting experience in the province, they come to Edmonton, or Calgary, to teach."

He says the problem is compounded by the fact that the student population at The University of Alberta has levelled off, while that at the University of Saskatchewan has continued to increase, making competition among the teachers that much greater.

If identifying the problem is easy, finding a solution to it is not, because there is no way to predict what the demand for teachers will be even a year from now.

"At one time, specialized training was an advantage on the job market," says Dr. Hodgson. "Now, however, if a teacher's specialty is not in demand, he may have a difficult time finding a job."

"But one should not attempt to forecast

what the demands will be, particularly within a certain field. If one attempts to set a quota in a particular year, on the assumption that it will yield the correct number of teachers four years later, that quota can be as far off as if none had been set at all.

"Even a double major is not necessarily the answer, because it may be that neither of the specialties will be in demand."

Initial reaction to the teacher surplus has been the supposition that the profession will automatically be upgraded—that is, with the large pool of talent from which to choose, school principals will naturally choose those teachers with the most training.

According to Dr. Hodgson, however, the present government grant structure is such that it makes it more advantageous to hire teachers with only three years of training (teaching certificates) than those with four to six years of training.

"If principals hired nothing but highly trained teachers, the salaries they would pay out would be greater, but the grant would not increase proportionately. Most school systems can't afford to do this."

GERALD BERRY, Chairman of the Department of Secondary Education at the University, agrees that teachers with specialized training may find it more difficult to find jobs than those teachers with certificates. Although he is not entirely convinced the teacher surplus is as great as it has been reported to be, he does say that "If we do have this surplus, the time might be opportune to increase the undergraduate program to four years rather than grant certificates after three years. This would make the teachers better qualified to compete for the jobs available."

"Men loven of propre kynde newfangelnesse" commented Chaycer's squire, and told of a Brazen Horse with a pin in its ear. When the rider manipulated the pin, the magic steed would carry him anywhere he fancied. Such as to the Students' Union Building.

DEAN OF ARTS SOUGHT

The selection committee established to recommend a successor to D. E. SMITH, Dean of Arts, invites nominations for the position from members of the University community.

Names of potential candidates should be sent to HENRY KREISEL, Vice-President (Academic).

LAWRENCE HOWARD NICHOLS 1890-1971

LAWRENCE HOWARD NICHOLS, Professor Emeritus of Physics, died September 3, in the military hospital at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Quebec. He had served with distinction in the artillery during World War I. He obtained his Bachelor of Arts degree at McGill University and his Master of Arts degree at The University of Alberta. He was appointed Lecturer in the Department of Physics in 1922 and Assistant Professor in 1927. During his 36-year association with the University he was named a Fellow of the Royal Meteorological Society and Professor of Physics.

In addition to his teaching duties and research projects, Professor Nichols conducted student choral groups and served as University organist. He co-operated with Casavant Frères of Ste. Hyacinthe, Quebec, in drawing up the original specifications of the Memorial Organ in Convocation Hall, and did the same when the organ was enlarged later on.

He was named Professor Emeritus in 1956.
